Interior Department Secretary Ryan Zinke has provided details his vision for the future of the agency. In a videotaped message last week, Zinke said plans call for dividing the country into 13 administrative regions based on the ecosystem and watersheds. Under the concept, Interior will manage these regions jointly with fewer decisions coming from individual bureaus or Interior sub-agencies. Zinke said certain administrative functions like budget, personnel, and legal will see few changes.

More than three-fourths of the National Park Service advisory board has quit over being "ignored" by Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke and the issue of climate change, according to a former governor who was part of the panel.

The resignations followed the members being repeatedly ignored by Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke and the Trump administration's agenda, according to a letter of resignation delivered to Zinke. Zinke has not met with the board despite several requests and invitations to do so, the letter read.

A number of requests to engage with Zinke "have been ignored and the matters on which we wanted to brief the new department team are clearly not part of the agenda," the resignation letter read.
